

Pezeshkian presents cabinet to Parliament for confidence vote

Evaluating cabinet: Focusing on plans over personalities

By Javad Daliri
Iranian journalist

OPINION EXCLUSIVE

Massoud Pezeshkian unveiled his cabinet picks yesterday, setting the stage for a vote of confidence in parliament. As expected, the list has sparked a flurry of reactions from across the political spectrum, with critics and supporters engaging in a lively debate. While some argue that the nominees are not in step with Pezeshkian's campaign promises, others have come to their defense. The responses reflect a range of perspectives, with some considering the interests of society, the people, and the government, while others view the cabinet through a partisan political lens. These diverse reactions certainly give us pause for thought.

Pezeshkian's proposed list of ministers can be assessed from multiple angles. Firstly, the suggested cabinet strikes a balance between youthful energy and seasoned expertise, with 14 new faces among the 19 nominees, including one woman, alongside experienced individuals who have proven their capabilities in previous administrations. However, a general appraisal suggests that some of the proposed ministers could become the government's Achilles' heel in critical situations, with their performance falling short of expectations and potentially causing troubles for the government itself.

Page 8 >

Iran's Watchful Eyes

Homegrown techs that fortify Iran's air defense

SPECIAL ISSUE

4-5 >

Three top nominees for economic ministries in cabinet lineup

2 >

Hezbollah launches 'squadrons of drones' at Israel after Sidon attack

7 >

Iranian-Armenian animation wins Italian accolade

8 >

Challenges of Abbasi Caravanserai in modern Semnan

3 >

Sensational Salimi grabs gold, caps off taekwondo heroics

Iran's taekwondo campaign at the Paris Olympics will be one for the ages after all four members of the squad finished on the podium in their respective events.

6 >

